Re: Please regulate violence on television

Dear Commissioner Martin:

The Federal Communications Commission should regulate violence on television.

You and the other commissioners recently received a draft report, which suggested that violent television programs may have an impact on children's behavior. The report's findings substantiate concerns raised by Christian parents, who have lobbied for greater oversight and restrictions in order to spare America's impressionable youngsters the repercussions of watching gratuitous stabbings, shootings and bloody gore.

The report also indicated that Congress could craft a law that would authorize the FCC to regulate violent TV programming much like it sets guidelines for sexual content and profanity. Barring violence from shows during hours when children may be watching is one possible regulation.

Please vote to accept the draft report, and urge Congress to give the FCC the authority it needs to clean up the nation's broadcast airwaves.

Thank you.

Sincerely,
